Knesset Votes To Limit Visits To West Germany, And Other Exchanges, After Heated Debate

The Knesset (Parliament) approved limitations on Israel's relations with West Germany. Rules for visits between the two countries and for cultural and educational exchanges were drawn up by a committee of six Cabinet ministers, says the New York Times. The rules were introduced by Abba Eban, Minister of Education, toward the end of an impassioned debate.

In explaining the Government's feeling that restrictions had to be imposed, Mr. Eban declared: "For a long time all contact between these peoples will remain in the shadow of their memories. It is impossible to isolate the holocaust within its narrow historical limits. The holocaust did not become a thing of the past from the moment of the destruction of the Nazi tyranny sixteen years ago."

The establishment of branches of any Germany companies or institutions in Israel was prohibited by the rules, except in connection with philanthropic activities.

The approving vote in the Knesset was not counted, but it appeared to have been confined to the four political parties that belong to Premier David Ben-Gurion's coalition Government.

The opposition parties moved to cover all cultural and educational ties with West Germany.

There are no formal diplomatic ties between Israel and West Germany or Communist East Germany.

Israel has a purchasing mission in Cologne headed by Dr. Felix Shinnar, who has the rank of Ambassador. West Germany is represented in Israel by the British Consulate in Haifa.

There has been a steadily growing tie between Israel and West Germany, says the New York Times. West Germans are now Israel's third best customers for a variety of agricultural and industrial products. Britain and the United States rank first and second.

There has also been a sharp increase in visits between Israel and West Germany, both official and unofficial. These were interrupted by the trial of Adolf Eichmann, the former Nazi official who was found guilty by an Israeli Tribunal of having played a major role in the murder of millions of European Jews in World War II. Eichmann has been sentenced to death.

Exchanges between Israel and West Germany will now be cut back sharply in several important fields.

Israeli youths will not be encouraged to study in West Germany and no foreign currency will be made available to them for this purpose. Advance study in German institutions will be discouraged except in matters vital to the state.

Professional entertainment by Germans in Israel or by Israelis in Germany will be prohibited and a committee of three Cabinet ministers will be empowered to decide which Israeli groups will be permitted to accept invitations to attend "artistic occasions" in Germany. The same rule will apply to Israeli participation in non-commercial exhibitions in Germany.

A ministerial committee will appoint an Israeli to do propaganda work in West Germany, and "suitable" visits by Germans, especially youths and professional persons, will be encouraged so that they may learn more of Israel, says the New York Times. The participation of Israelis in international events in Germany and of Germans in international events in Israel will be permitted.

Public institutions invited to send representatives to West Germany or wishing to invite Germans to Israel must apply first to the Israeli Government for "guidance."

The effect these limitations might have on West Germany's attitude toward Israel will doubtless be the cause of new anxiety in Israel. Financial assistance to Israel from Germany has for years covered a major part of the deficit in Israel's balance of trade.

Under a twelve-year reparations agreement that Israel signed with the West German Government in 1952, Israel was promised $715,000,000 in goods and payments for oil imports. By the end of last September, $700,000,000 in goods had been delivered or ordered for delivery.

In addition to the reparations payments, Bonn has also been making restitution to individual Israelis in the form of cash payments. By the end of last November these payments totaled $434,000,000.

It has been said on good authority in Israel, says the New York Times, that Chancellor Adenauer, in his meeting in the United States with Mr. Ben-Gurion in March, 1960, committed West Germany to provide Israel with $500,000,000 more in loans and investments over a ten-year period after reparations were exhausted.

The Canadian Jewish Review is still the only Jewish publication in Canada printed in any language reaching the Jewish community which is not sponsored by a group or an organization and which is able to claim membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulations.

Work At Family Factory Was Springboard To Distinguished Career As Expert Printer

Elmer Adler, former curator of graphic arts at Princeton University and founder at San Juan P.R., of La Casa del Libro, a museum of fine books, died at Pavia Clinic, Santurce, after having suffered a heart attack. He was 77 years old.

Mr. Adler moved there from the United States several years ago as consultant on typography to the Commonwealth's Economic Development Administration, says the New York Times. In 1957 he founded the Amigos de Calle del Cristo 255 — La Casa del Libro.

To Elmer Adler printing was an art, not a business. His interest in it grew out of his work as advertising and sales promotion manager for his family's clothing manufacturing concern in Rochester.

In 1922 Mr. Adler came to New York "to lose his fortune," as a friend once put it. In that year, in partnership with Walter Dorwin Teague, David Silver, and Hubert L. Canfield, he founded the Pynson Printers. The firm, named for Richard Pynson, sixteenth-century printer who introduced Roman type in England, had at first three presses, and one customer.

It has been said that in the eighteen years of its existence the Pynson Printers charged more than any shop in the country and never made a profit. But it was the place to which discriminating publishers took their manuscripts when they wanted a work of beauty and distinction.

Mr. Adler's associates left for other pursuits shortly after the venture was begun and he continued the business himself. He produced his first book in 1923. It was an edition of 450 copies of Willa Cather's "April Twilights," published by Alfred A. Knopf, Inc.

In 1924, the Pynson Printers had moved from its premises over a garage to quarters at The New York Times, 229 West Forty-third Street. It occupied an exhibition room, library, offices, and printing plant and rapidly acquired what has been described as "the most uncommercial atmosphere imaginable.

One of Mr. Adler's favorite projects was started in 1930. It was The Colophon, a quarterly dedicated to the interests of booklovers. The quarterly ceased publication in 1940, says the New York Times. Frederick B. Adams Jr., one of Mr. Adler's colleagues who later was to become director of the Morgan Library, explained the purpose of The Colophon in 1941.

In an address delivered at an exhibition of the work of the Pynson Printers and entitled "Elmer Adler: Apostle of Good Taste," Mr. Adams said:

"To book fanciers of every taste it offered fine printing, literary gossip, bibliographical research, original prints and collecting lore, all presented with such superb distinction that I feel sure civilization will never look upon its like again."

Publication of the quarterly was resumed in 1948 under the title of The New Colophon, and nine volumes were issued until it ceased publication in 1960. Philip C. Duschnes published the new quarterly.

Another of Mr. Adler's pet projects was The New York Times Museum of the History of the Recorded Word, which was opened in the Times Building on Forty-third Street in 1938. Mr. Adler collected, over a period of twelve years, books, papers, and other examples of early writing and printing that were placed in the permanent exhibition. The complete display presents a history of man's progress through 5,000 years of effort to improve his means of communicating events and ideas to his fellows.

In 1940 Mr. Adler became research associate in the graphic arts department of Princeton University and consultant to the Princeton University Press. In that year the Pynson Printers closed its shop so that Mr. Adler could devote his entire time to teaching and research.

Mr. Adler retired from the university in 1952 as curator of graphic arts, says the New York Times. At the time it was announced that the Princeton University Press had bought the hand press and other printing equipment of [illegible], printer emeritus of Yale University, to be dedicated as a memorial to Mr. Adler.

In June, 1956, the late Carl W. Jones, former publisher of The Minneapolis Journal, gave $25,000 to the university to establish the Elmer Adler Graphic Arts Fund. The fund was to be used to finance lectures, demonstrations and the preparation of leaflets.

Meanwhile, Mr. Adler had moved to San Juan, P. R., where he founded the museum of fine books, which is considered to be the best in the Western Hemisphere outside of the Continental United States. It was officially opened to the public in April, 1958. With the assistance of friends, Mr. Adler assembled a collection of 4,000 notable books, worth about $250,000.

Mr. Adler was born in Rochester on July 22, 1884. He attended Phillips Andover Academy and took special courses at the University of Rochester and Harvard. In World War I he served as a training camp secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association. Before 1921 he was a director of social service institutions in Rochester.

He was co-founder of the publishing firm of Random House and had been an adviser in typography to The Baltimore Sun, The New York Times, Scribner's, Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., and other organizations. He also lectured on typography at the New School for Social Research and New York University. In 1953 Bucknell University conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws.

Mr. Adler was once described as having "a certain country-squirish appearance that marked him immediately as a true gentleman and bon vivant." However, he neither smoked nor drank, an aspect of his character that sometimes placed a gentle strain on his relations with his friends, says the New York Times. In this connection, Rockwell Kent, speaking in 1941 of the work of the Pynson Printers, had this to say:

"When the Pynson Printers closed their doors there came to an end an era in printing in America. And there came to the end also something else — the last place in New York — and for all I know, in America — where when people were asked to come to tea, they got tea."

Poor Training Affects Faith Of Students, Says Bnai Brith

A warning that Jewish college students may lose their faith because of the elementary quality of their prior religious education was sounded recently by Bnai Brith, the Jewish service organization, says the New York Times. A survey found Jewish students generally ready to identify their religion when they enrolled — in contrast to their parents' generation — but suffering from "an understanding of Judaism that has been arrested at the elementary-school level."

"The student who studies the mind of Periclean Athens in juxtaposition to the rabbinic mind of the Sunday school is likely to jettison the rabbinic concepts," the Bnai Brith international board of governors was told in a report. The board met at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel for its 18th annual meeting.

Jewish education, the report said, "must not be vacuum-packed for children, but must be adult-motivated and have a relevancy to modern Jewish life approached with the same intellectual and academic integrity as the study of social and physical sciences."

Bnai Brith sponsors Hillel Foundations, conducting religious and cultural programs for Jewish students on 239 college campuses. The report, prepared by Dr. William Haber, of Ann Arbor, Mich., chairman of the Foundations, said that nearly 300,000 Jewish students were enrolled this semester in American colleges and universities and that they constituted 7.5 per cent of the campus population.

A seven per cent rise in Jewish enrollment over last year compares with an increase of five per cent for all students. Jewish enrollments at smaller colleges have increased at double the rate of increase in larger state and urban universities.

A survey of Hillel directors at seventy-five major universities found greater campus interest in political and social action than at any time since World War II, although not as great as before the war, says the New York Times. However, the John Birch Society was said to have made little headway among college students, while Communist or Communist-front groups were termed ineffective.

N. Y. Leader Charges Jews Excluded In Temple Emanu-El District

The president of Temple Emanu-El, Fifth Avenue, New York, the largest Jewish house of worship in the U.S., charged that there were "clusters of multiple dwellings" in the vicinity of the synagogue on the Upper East Side that refused to admit members of his faith as tenants.

Alfred E. Bachrach, senior partner of the accounting firm of Alfred E. Bachrach & Co., made the charge at a dinner in the temple attended by about 300 members of the congregation, says the New York Times. At the dinner Mr. Bachrach received the annual award of the Men's Club of the Temple.

In presenting the award plaque, the Rev. Dr. Julius Mark, senior rabbi, said: "The Men's Club of Temple Emanu-El is pleased to honor you for your selfless dedication to the welfare of the congregation and community."

In his address of appreciation, Mr. Bachrach, president since 1956, said that he had a serious matter to bring to the attention of the congregation:

"In a few square miles surrounding Fifth Avenue and Sixty-fifth street [the site of the temple]" he said, "there are clusters of multiple dwellings in which people of the Jewish faith, regardless of their lowliness or loftiness, are not permitted to live.

"Who or what stops them? Devils? Demons? Walls of steel or brick? No, ladies and gentlemen — just our neighbors, our friends, our fellow — human beings."

In an interview, with the New York Times he said there had been at least one specific instance of discrimination against a member of the congregation in a cooperative dwelling a short distance from the Temple. Remedial action against this discrimination is in adjudication, he added.

The Anti-Defamation League of Bnai Brith has reported that the last remaining bastion of prejudice against Jews in housing appears to be the high-priced cooperatives on the upper East Side.

The League's figures showed that one-third of the 7175 luxury co ops in Manhattan had no Jewish tenants.

The New York City Commission on Intergroup Relations commented in June that many of the co-ops were "fortresses of anti-Semitism and monumental symbols of discriminatory exclusion based upon racial or ethnic identity."

The Anti-Defamation League said that it had received few reports of such discrimination and that in most cases the people involved had refused to file complaints with the commission, as they are entitled to do under the city's anti-bias law.

The Fair-Housing Practices Law prohibits discrimination in rental, lease, or sale of all privately financed housing except some small owner-occupied units.

The League's figures showed and dislike of publicity are the chief reasons why people of the Jewish faith have not filed many more complaints about housing bias.

Each year the annual award of the Emanu-El Men's Club is presented to someone in the 2,000-member congregation, says the New York Times. Previous recipients have included Mrs. Caroline K. Simon, Secretary of the State of New York; former Governor of New York and Senator, Herbert H. Lehman, David Sarnoff, Senator Jacob K. Javits, and Richard Rodgers, the composer. The dinner was held in the Isaac M. Wise Hall of the Temple Community House, 1 East Sixty-Fifth Street.

The Humanist Approach

BY JACOB BONNTAG, EDITOR OF THE JEWISH QUARTERLY, OF LONDON, ENGLAND

Today it is generally accepted that the future development of any country depends on the standard and technical skill of its labor force. That was not always so. Particularly among Jews the "message" of ORT was in the nature of an inner revolution: in prewar Eastern Europe where the prevailing type of Jew was characterized as "Luftmensch," ORT propagated, and worked for a return to manual skilled labor as the best means of economic and social advance to greater independence of the individual, enabling him either to become better integrated in the society in which he lived, or to face the future more securely should he decide on emigrating to another country.

In the post-war period ORT's entry into North Africa and some countries of the Middle East greatly assisted in the transformation of the economic position of the Jews in these countries, by instituting vocational training for the young in such trades as became available as a result of the economic and political developments these countries were undergoing.

Finally, ORT's contribution to Israel's economy during the last ten years or so is generally recognised as being of the utmost importance, in preparing the skilled workers required by the steadily expanding industrial enterprises in the country.

One aspect of the work of ORT which is not sufficiently stressed but cannot be stressed enough is that, besides purely technical training, it provides higher general education for its pupils and graduates, as an integral part of the curriculum in each of its various branches.

The guiding principle here is that a skilled technician must know much more than the particular job he is asked to perform, and the more he knows the better he will be at his job — quite apart from the fact the tasks he may be asked to perform are much more varied in developing countries, whose industrial equipment is mostly imported and, therefore, of the latest up-to-date standards.

In other words, the man at the bench or at the wheel in a modern, progressing society must be a man of knowledge. In this respect, as in many others, ORT is pioneering a new — one is tempted to say, a humanistic — approach to the problem of technical education.

ORT thus acts as a unifying factor, raising the cultural standards of backward communities and bringing the more advanced together — not by preaching abstract ideas, but by putting into practice the ideals of the dignity of labor, and of social progress through work and education.

While the purely humanitarian aspects of ORT's work should not be under-estimated — the immediate effect, for instance, of increased earnings when the younger members of poor families acquire a skilled trade — its long-term aims and functions are by no means exhausted.

There is still the need, even in some Western countries, of propaganda for technological education among Jews as the more promising and more practical for the younger generation.

There is still the need for providing opportunities to tens of thousands of young Jews in Asia and Africa.

And as far as Israel is concerned, to which ORT is devoting an increasing share of its efforts and resources, there is still an immense amount of work to be done in the field of technical training in order to maintain and to increase Israel's industrial potential. Moreover, by providing technical

Geraniums, Love's Old Sweet Song Again

BY MRS. ZELDA BECK

It was typical of him that he did not catch the girl's name. When he arrived his mother was just getting ready to light the Shabbos candles. "Who is the girl you want me to see this week, Ma?" he asked.

"Leah," she told him, and covered her gray hair with a white silk handkerchief, lifted her hands in circles, three times, held them before her eyes, fingers spread, and said the blessing. Leo suspected she always waited for the sound of his key in the lock before welcoming the Sabbath. He came home only on Friday nights, left late Saturday night for the city, again, for his work in the research laboratories where he held an important position.

He had showered, changed his clothes, and come into the kitchen just as his father returned from shul, having prayed there, welcoming the Sabbath. Leo heard himself speaking with the old boyish enthusiasm, in a voice which he kept strictly for his parents, but which years of trying to please them had made automatically childish, a recording he played over and over again, even this evening, when he was thirty-two years old, his forehead lined, his hairline receding, his shell-rimmed glasses bifocals.

"Did your mother tell you about the girl she wants you to meet this week, Leo?" his father said.

"What's her telephone number, Pa?"

"Oh, Leo! Every week your mother writes down a telephone number for you to call — and what do you do? You lose it, maybe? Or you throw it away?"

"Abe," his mother said, "make Kiddush. Leo's hungry."

Slowly the ritual of the Sabbath calmed him, with eternal peace: the singing of the Kiddush; the washing of the hands with a half-full cup of water, first one hand and then the other; and the prayerful blessing as the hands were wiped dry; the blessing before cutting the Shabbos chalah.

Instinctively, before they would talk about the girl they wanted him to call this week, he knew that they were getting more and more worried about his never getting married at all. He felt the intensity of their fear, their desire to see him settled with a good Jewish wife, with a Jewish home of his own, and children he would send to Hebrew school. They worried about him, away from home all week, working with chemicals they didn't understand, eating in restaurants, not getting enough sleep.

It was not a selfish concern they had for him; they didn't want pleasure for themselves — except maybe peace of mind. They didn't care about anything — except what was good for him. No; it was deeper, more menacing, in its way more destructive; a concern which did not allow him the privilege of choosing his own wife. Leo found himself saying:

"Come, Pa. You tell me. Who is the girl for this week?"

"Marriage," his mother said, pointing a finger at him, "is no laughing matter. Marriages are made in Heaven."

"So! True!" His father pounded the table. "What man would get married if Heaven didn't give him a push?"

"Abe!" his mother said, pointing her finger at him now. They were all eating fish, gefilte fish. "Look out, Abe, sometimes there is a bone!"

"I have to tell him about the girl you have for him this week," his father said, "don't I?"

"Never mind. I'll tell him."

"You don't trust me, Helen?" his father said.

"I don't trust you?"

"Nu! So I'll tell Leo!" He pounded the table again. The sound was muted. Two thicknesses of table padding lay between the damask cloth and the polished table top. His mother always served hot dishes. Everything had to be burning hot or it was no good.

"Abe!" his mother shouted. "The neighbours! Must they hear every word you say?"

"That's it: the neighbours!" his father shouted. "You should only see them, Leo!"

"Abe, did you finish your fish? Are you ready now for soup?" His mother suddenly spoke very softly.

"What's wrong with the new neighbours?" Leo said.

"Abe," his mother pleaded, "Abe!" She served the soup. She poured the golden chicken soup over the heap of fine noodles. The silver ladle in her hand trembled, the beautiful silver ladle that had been her mother's wedding present.

"They bought that house next door, didn't they?" Leo said. "Are they friendly people?"

"Leo, listen to me," his father spoke as if he were alone with Leo in the white tiled kitchen; father and son. "Leo, you should see the man — he's my age, maybe a year older. He wears a long black coat and black pants and black shoes and white socks, and a hat with fur tails — so big." He spread both hands around his head in a circle a yard wide.

"Only on Shabbos," his mother said to Leo.

"She's very good looking," Leo's mother said.

"She wears a shaytil! (a wig)."

"So your mother wore a shaytil, Abe!"

"My mother — how many years ago was that? This is 1961, Helen!" His laughter was contagious. He laughed with all his heart. Leo caught himself smiling without knowing why.

"So?" his mother said, "it's not so funny like you make it, Abe. It could be sad, very sad, Abe."

"It's good soup," his father said, suddenly solemn. He sighed, blew steadily on the soup in his spoon, and then sipped it, slowly. "Very good, Helen."

"What were you laughing about, Pa?" Leo said.

His father gave him a long, sad look. "For a man thirty-two years old, you are not so smart, tonight, Leo."

"Why only tonight?" Leo said, continuing to play the game, although he knew that this was his father's way of belittling him, of making him feel inadequate. It was his father's way of getting even with him, too, for having refused to go into the pants business, keep up the tradition, pants: father to son.

"You know, Leo," his mother said, her tone light, her manner so casual as she changed the subject that Leo did not suspect, never suspected, in all the years afterward, that she was pretending to be happy because she had given up hope of seeing him married. "I did that, what you told me — about making more geraniums grow — breaking off stems, putting them in sand, very, very little water — I got a whole new lot of geraniums. You should see how nice they grow. I put a lot of them outside, on the windows, in the sun."

"More and more geraniums," his father said, "every place you turn in the house, inside and outside the windows — geraniums!"

Leo said, "Don't evade the issue, Ma. Who is the girl you want me to call up this week? Where's the paper with her phone number on it?" He was sipping the hot soup. It warmed him, made him feel safe.

His father had finished the soup. "I want to tell Leo more about our new neighbours, Helen. You don't mind?"

"Why do I have to mind?" She was standing now, spoon in hand, the big platter of roast chicken to her left, the bowl of hot kugel-squares to her right, the kugel fragrant with cinnamon and lemon, and browned apples, sliced on top, "but maybe you should eat your roast chicken first, Abe? You don't want to spoil your appetite, do you?"

His father nodded to Leo and winked. "You see how she forces me to eat? No wonder I look like what I look like."

"Your never looked better in your life, Pa!"

His father laughed. Leo joined in, warmed by the rich soup, stimulated by the good roast chicken, the fragrant kugel. He was beginning to feel warm, drowsy, weightless. "I think I'll open a window," he said, "getting close in here, isn't it?"

"In the living room," his mother said. "If we open the window in the kitchen I feel a draught."

There was the Shabbos light burning, the big lamp in the living room. It burned all through the Shabbos, all Friday night and all day Saturday, until sundown. Leo opened the centre window, pushed the sash up, reached out to feel the cold air on his wrists, tipped the edge of a geranium leaf. The clay pot toppled, and fell, with a crash. He could see it in the driveway, on the site of the house next door. He said nothing about it in the kitchen. He said nothing about it even when the bell rang and he had an intuition someone was complaining about the pieces of sharp clay and stones in their driveway.

"I'll see who it is," he said, jumping up to answer the door, glad to get away from the heaping dish of applesauce his mother just put before him; that was only part of the desert. There would be almond nut bread and tea, and maybe candied orange peel, too. He wouldn't have dared to refuse the desert. They would have thought him sick, or unhappy, or worse, finding fault with them.

But then, as soon as he had his hand on the doorknob, he knew he must not go back into the kitchen, should not, if he could shape his own fate. To eat all that food waiting for him would demolish him completely, turn him into a child again, a child who would do anything for his parents' approval.

He opened the door. "You came just in time." No, he hadn't said it. The girl out on the stairs wouldn't have understood, yet, and there was a chance that she might understand, some day.

Suddenly, perhaps in response to some prayer his mother had spoken over the candles, besides the usual blessing, perhaps at the recalled sight of the heaping plate of applesauce and almond nut bread on the table, the part of his heart that he always left behind in the research room came into those four square feet of clear, cool, night air, sweet with June madness, and was united with that smaller part of his mind which had been rebelling against his mother. Now he was able to see and think and make his own choice.

The girl was tall and slim and dark-haired. She held the root ball of a geranium in both her hands. Her eyes were enormous and shy. "I beg your pardon . . ." she said. "I didn't mean to intrude. But one of Mrs. Cohen's plants . . ."

"I know."

"The clay pot broke. I'm sorry. All those pieces, out in our driveway."

"We'll go and pick them up, together," he said.

But then, as soon as he had walked down the path with her — as soon as he was alone with her in the dark coolness of the quiet street, he could not resist touching her arm, lightly, with the tips of his fingers, and remembered, too late, that he had forgotten to leave the root ball in the foyer.

"I'll take it," he said, opening his palm.

Carefully, and without a word, as if she had been expecting him

★ YM-YWHA CAMP CAMPAIGN ★

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Bronfman will act as honorary patrons for the capital fund campaign of the projected summer camp at Huberdeau in the Laurentians, ninety miles from Montreal. The announcement was made by Joe Rubin, general chairman for the $850,000 drive. Charles R. Bronfman is publicity chairman. He said at a press conference in the Montefiore Club that the camp "will fill a community need, and reflects a desire by the Y.M.-Y.W.H.A. to operate a summer camp which will emphasize Jewish identification, continuity, and tradition in the context of our Canadian way of life." With Mr. Rubin was Harvey Golden, executive director of the Y.M.-Y.W.H.A. Another basic objective of the project is to provide summer camping facilities at cost for hundreds of children who are deprived of the benefit of camp experience in the community. Construction of the camp will begin this summer with operation by 1963. There will be two camping periods per summer, each of four weeks duration. The camp will serve approximately 1,000 boys and girls. The camp will be situated on 550 acres of alternately level, rolling, and mountainous terrain, laced by three lakes and fronting a river, ideal for woodlore and camping trips. The camp is located five miles from the village of Huberdeau, and ten miles southwest of St. Jovite. The site is accessible by two highway routes, and the CNR operates a train to Huberdeau three times weekly. Jewish dietary laws will be followed, as well as other traditional observances. The camp itself will be divided into "villages", forty children to each such unit, in order to facilitate programming and supervision of small groups. One of the main goals of the camp, Mr. Golden said, is to train the youngsters in self-reliance, emphasizing outdoor living, "tripping," and wood craft activities; and generally implementing a "coureur des bois" type of existence, in addition to the conventional camp program.

Molly Picon's
MISH-MASH

Like so many fathers of his day, Papa had his heart set on a boy. I don't think he ever forgave me for being a girl. He blamed Mama for it, and constantly referred to me as "Your daughter." When my sister Helen was born, it was more than poor Papa could bear. He said the whole world was against him, even his wife. Without a son, who would carry on the Pyekoon name?

Yes, Pyekoon was the name Papa came to America with, but one of my very first theatre managers simplified it to Picon. He said Picon would be much easier for people to remember. I'm sure he shortened it, though, to save on his electric bill when he put my name up in lights on the marquee. With such a simple name, why did I get so many letters addressed to Mali Pipkin, Maly Picnic, Moly Pippick, and many more interesting variations?

That always reminds me of the delightful story Sholem Aleichem tells about a little boy named Dick. When his teacher asked him how a Jewish boy got the name Dick, he answered, "My name was Yitzchok, but the other kids made fun of me, so my Pop changed it to Dick." "But how did you get from Yitzchok to Dick?" she asked. "Oh, that was easy. We changed it from Yitzchok to Itzy, Itzy to Pitzy, Pitzy to Ritzy, Ritzy to Richard, and Richard to Dick."

When names change, it's usually for the better. But when the weather changes, especially this time of year, it could get cold. You know, they say necessity is the mother of invention. I think Rokeach invented Barley and Mushroom Soup because in winter it's absolutely a necessity. You'd be surprised what wonderful insulation a nice hot plate of thick, delicious Rokeach Barley and Mushroom Soup can be against the cold. You know why? Because it's full of barley, mushrooms and a lot of other vegetables that give you and the children that extra nourishment you need when it's chilly outside. And it goes without saying, you'll love the long-simmered flavor of all Rokeach soups. So the minute it gets cold, have some Rokeach Barley and Mushroom Soup right away, and see how warm it keeps you. Who needs a fur coat?

Molly

Workmen's Circle Studies Question: Why Yiddish Education?

A study of what prompts American Jews with no strong religious commitment to continue to raise their children in the Yiddish cultural tradition is now being made by the Workmen's Circle, national Jewish cultural and fraternal order. A four-page questionnaire is now being sent out to 3,000 parents of children in the secular Jewish schools which the Workmen's Circle operates in New York, Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Detroit, and other cities through the U.S.

Salmon Yefroikin, Workmen's Circle educational director, who is supervising the study, says that "there has been a continuing upsurge of interest and enrolment in our schools, especially in suburban areas, and we are curious to know what is behind it." Mr. Yefroikin said that the questionnaire had been drawn up by Joseph Mlotek, director of the Workmen's Circle's forty schools in the New York metropolitan area, on the basis of his experience over the past ten years.

It asks detailed questions about the parents' background and schooling, their interest in Jewish life, religious affiliation, observance of Jewish dietary laws, and general involvement with acts and interests generally regarded as part of Jewish family life. Typical questions asked are the following: Are there any Jewish phonograph records in your home? Are candles lit on the eve of Sabbath in your home? Do you or your spouse attend synagogue services on the high holidays? Does your family prepare or attend a Seder?

The questionnaire also asks whether the parents speak, write, or understand Yiddish and why they are sending their children to a Jewish secular school. Workmen's Circle schools teach courses in Jewish history and folklore, current Jewish affairs, Yiddish language, and culture; also courses in Hebrew, folk-songs, and art.

Mr. Yefroikin said that a similar study made in 1954 had produced interesting results. "It showed that 77 per cent of the children came from homes in which one or both parents had been born in the United States," he said. "The amount of Jewish education they had had was not really significant. Yet it was obvious that, in many respects, they had a strong desire to continue their identification with Jewish life. Almost two out of three lit candles on the Sabbath. Three out of four attended a synagogue on the High Holy days. Four out of five prepared a Seder on Passover."

Typical of the comments made to the early questionnaire were the following (From American-born parents, both college graduates): "We feel that Yiddish is the universal language of Jews all over the world and that learning Yiddish and Yiddish literature will bring our child closer to Jews and to their cultural heritage." (From an American-born father and a Russian-born mother): "We do not have any religious ceremonies in our home. We are, however, Jews and we want our children to know that they are Jews."

Other answers: "With Yiddish my child will become attached, in a modern way, to Jewish traditions." "A Jewish girl will conduct a better Jewish home if she knows Yiddish." "It is important for a child of a minority group to know his language and his culture. He will be better equipped to adjust to non-Jewish surroundings."

Mr. Yefroikin said that the current study will probably be completed in April, 1962.

to ask for it, she gave it to him. A passing plane made them both look up. Heaven looked alive and watching him. Heaven. She was waiting for him to say something about how beautiful the sky shone with so many stars. And he was looking at her, grateful, because she could have been less perfect, and he would have fallen in love with her just the same.

He turned to look at his house, only once. His father and mother stood at the open door to find out what had become of him. He turned his back on them. He did not realize he had been silent so long until he heard her say, suddenly:

"Is there something I can do to help?"

"Why?"

"You're perplexed, aren't you?"

"I was only wondering. Suppose your name isn't Leah?"

She laughed. "But it is, of course."

Currency Devaluation To Liberalize The Economy Of Israel

EXCERPTS FROM A BROADCAST BY LEVY ESHKOL, MINISTER OF FINANCE OF ISRAEL

Since the establishment of the state we have been working hard to build our national economy . . . The population of the country has increased. The great majority of the immigrants have been thoroughly absorbed in our economy and our society and have achieved economic self support.

We have built up a ramified network of educational institutions covering about six hundred thousand pupils and students from the kindergarten to the university, the Technion and other research institutions. We have fortified the security of the state against its enemies. Hundreds of villages have been established and forests planted throughout the country.

Tremendous and inspiring work has been done in settlement and agriculture which serve as an example in productive capacity and the moulding of new social frameworks. Within a period of a few years we have carried out wide-scale industrialization throughout the country and have firmly established new and variegated branches of production. We have increased the output of quarries and brought to light natural resources including oil and gas. We have set up basic installations for the abundant supply of water and electricity.

We have laid down routes over the length and breadth of the land. We operate sea and air fleets on an international scale. We have constructed hundreds of thousands of houses both for immigrants and for veteran settlers. Our workers have acquired valuable experience and skill. A working nation and a generation of scientists have arisen. In several important social and economic fields we are already able to place our experience at the disposal of the developing nations of Africa and Asia. . . . We have succeeded in encouraging an ever increasing stream of private business investments.

Thanks to all these factors we have succeeded in maintaining a rapid rate of increase of the national product and constantly enhancing the productivity of the economy. We have also greatly increased our exports and penetrated into new markets.

We have laid the foundations. Now we must set about building the superstructure. We are faced with grave challenges.

In the world economy things are happening which we cannot ignore. New frameworks for international trade are being created. The most noteworthy phenomenon is the accelerated consolidation of the European Common Market. This development may amalgamate the economies of the Western European nations into one mighty economic power with an extremely high level of efficiency and productivity . . .

In view of these factors we must draw appropriate conclusions in respect of the Israeli economy. As a relatively small country in population and area we cannot choose economic conditions of the world in which we live to suit ourselves. Even large and strong countries with variegated internal economies and a considerable degree of self-supply are being compelled to adapt themselves to the new arrangements. How much more does this apply to the Israel economy which is poor in natural resources the great bulk of whose raw material have to be imported and whose industry is in essence a secondary industry. The consolidation of the Common Market is particularly significant for Israel because we need the markets of Western Europe for almost all our agricultural exports and most of our industrial exports.

The decisive criterion of our capacity to become integrated in the condition of the world market will be the competitive capacity of our produce. It should be remembered that complete integration in the world market is a two-way street affecting both the export of our produce to foreign markets and also the import of foreign goods into our economy. We must therefore create conditions not only to strengthen the competitive capacity of our exports in foreign markets but also to ensure that our goods will be able to stand their ground in the local market and face the competition of imported goods without the protective wall of high defensive tariffs and other import restrictions. . . .

We must therefore take vigorous measures to improve our balance of payments and to cover the main part of our foreign currency expenditure by our own efforts. Despite the difficulties which may confront our marketing channels we must increase the rate of growth of our exports. We must also accelerate the process of substituting locally produced goods for imported goods in those fields in which this can be done at reasonable prices.

I am confident that the Israeli economy is strong enough to face these challenges. After evaluating the latent power of the economy, and as a result of the need to anticipate future events, we have laid down a comprehensive plan for the stabilization of the economy. . . .

The rate of exchange for foreign trade:

1. The Israel pound will be fixed at a uniform rate of 3 IL. to the U.S. dollar. This rate will apply to the export of goods and services, to imports, and to capital transfers. With the establishment of the new rate the premium system for the export of goods and services and subsidies for capital transfers will be abolished.

2. Most levies on import goods will be abolished. The import of equipment as well as in part of raw materials will be entirely free of customs. Customs rates on other goods will also be considerably reduced.

3. Relying on the new exchange rate as a brake against excessive expansion of imports we shall be able gradually to remove administrative restrictions on imports. We shall also work for the simplification of procedure in matters of foreign trade including the abolition of the need for import permits in regard to certain categories of goods.

Production and development policy:

4. We shall gradually lower the barriers of excessive protection of local produce against imports. In order to place the branches of industry and agriculture on a basis of cheap and efficient production it is our intention to limit the calling of protective customs, and to abolish quantitative restrictions on imports. Outside the sphere of protection, local goods will have to face competition with imported goods.

5. The government will continue to assist by granting development loans on easy terms. It will also assist by training of staffs and in other ways in the establishment of new undertakings and the improvement of the efficiency of existing undertakings. However, we shall make sure that the aid will be given only to those undertakings which, after a not excessive period of preparation and adaptation, will be able to face competitive conditions in both foreign and local markets.

6. The government will shortly establish the framework and the regulations for planning development of the various branches of the economy for a period of four to five years. We will thus work for the development of the economy according to a long-range plan.

7. The government will act in cooperation with the Histadrut (General Federation of Labour) to establish measures to ensure greater labour efficiency in manufacturing enterprises and government and public services.

Stabilization of the economy and the prevention of inflation.

8. The government will take measures to ensure stability of prices. It will ensure abundant supply of both local and imported products and when necessary will provide subsidies from its budget to prevent an increase in the prices of essential products. The prices of oil will not change, the price of sugar will not be raised and the price of bread will not be raised more than may be necessary as a result of factors unconnected with this programme. The government will also prevent as far as possible an increase in the rates charged for its services.

9. The government will take measures to prevent the making of unjustified profits and excessive expenditures which lead to an increase in prices. We intend to intensify our activities within the framework of the law on restraint of trade to prevent high profits. We will also act by fiscal means to prevent excessive profits, if the need should arise.

10. The government intends in cooperation with the Histadrut to take appropriate steps to ensure the implementation of the principle that any rise in wages shall not exceed the rate of increase of the workers' contribution to the increase of the net national output. Accordingly a suitable part of the additional output will be devoted to lowering the prices of our products in foreign markets and only part will be directed to increasing incomes.

11. The cost of living allowance system will be maintained.

12. As part of the efforts to be made by all concerned to ensure the stability of the economy the government will contribute its share by refraining from raising taxes, apart, naturally, from the financing of unexpected emergency needs.

13. The government will endeavour to persuade recipients of personal restitution compensation payments (from Germany) in fixed term deposits in the banks under conditions ensuring reasonable income.

14. We will endeavour to balance the government finances on both a budgetary and a cash basis.

15. Bank credit to the public will be extended at a rate not exceeding the rate of increase of real output.

16. We will intensify our efforts to increase savings in the confidence that the stabilization of the economy and the currency on a firm basis will increase the tendency of all sections of the public to save.

17. Any proposal for the acceptance of a foreign loan will be examined before being approved from the point of view of the length of the term of the loan and its contribution to the raising of the level of production. The establishment of a stable rate for the Israel pound makes it possible to stop the acceptance and granting of loans linked to the exchange rate.

18. The government will of course honour all its obligations arising out of linking clauses in bonds that it has issued in the past and in its other debts.

I must add that we held detailed discussions in connection with this plan with experts of the International Monetary Fund, and that the plan has the support and blessing of the Fund.

Government storehouses are full, the shops have an abundance of goods, our production is high, and our foreign currency surpluses are extensive. The government will see to it that the abundant supply of products and the current prices of the essential products I have mentioned will remain in force. . . .

We are carrying out this stabilization plan not from a position of weakness but of strength and we are sure that with the means at our disposal we can prevent the danger of profiteering. . . .

The production plan which I have just presented to you will constitute an important and maybe decisive stage in the achievement of these aims. It is in your hands. The government expects every man and woman in Israel to play their part in the common effort for the stabilization of the national economy and the consolidation of our sovereignty.
